What describes a "new to you" UDL experience in this course?

Transcription tools

Graphic organizer syllabus

I think the frame of mind when I approach my work with students. Even for smaller events like workshops. To add flexibility and choices, and to be aware that my preferences for learning are not the same as others.

Considering how questions/activities are framed for individuals with a different mother tongue.

Though it was not "New" - but the 3 principles of UDL and their followed 9 - actually sums up all the opportunity and experience you would like your learner to get... and thats beautiful!

The glossary

Expanded viewpoints

Understanding of what "universal" in this context means

The neural network

12

What describes a "new to you" UDL experience in this course?

The range of apps used. For example, the Padlet used to allow us to introduce ourselves.

The consideration of the neural network is very helpful. It encourages holistic approach to learning.

I guess my best answer is: what wasn't new? I had incorporated some UDL-ish components in my class without knowing what UDL is. one thing I learned in this course is how valuable it is to simply have "choose 2 of the following...",

12

With new understanding about UDL, what is something you want to include in your course?

Student choices scatter throughout my course

opportnity to do non-group works for individual learners

Revising activities to include more options and engaging activities.

Transcription and scripts and video.

Options to help learners coming from different backgrounds to be able to access, participate and understand all course materials

Choice of submission and using their interests

Being flexible, being inclusive for all... giving lots of other opportunities for them to explore...

Practical exercises or interventions for learners

More resources for all students

With new understanding about UDL, what is something you want to include in your course?

The flexibility part